IF For Pete Olson, owner of PJ Builders, it's all about the client. For instance, when building custom homes, he and his team get to know the clients – do they ski and bike, or are they more of a movie buff? – to ensure the finished product best suits their lifestyle.

“Your house should serve you as opposed to the other way around,” he said.

That philosophy has been a main reason PJ Builders has thrived in Park City for nearly a quarter-century. But it's not the only secret ingredient that Olson believes has made the company so successful. Just as important is the company's commitment to making the home-building process as painless and rewarding as possible for clients, who may be unfamiliar with what can sometimes be an intensive undertaking.

“We’re really honest and upfront,” Olson said. “And when we have problems or things we have to overcome, we communicate with the homeowner and tell them what the plan is.”

Of course, there's also the fact that the craftsmanship PJ Builders offers is top notch: “Our goal is to build a house that is going to last 100 years,” Olson said.
